'Black and British'? A poem by Dayna Francis

'Black and British' should not be a thing,
It should be you, me, him, her, them and they,
But people look to your colour and country for your story,
And assume they realise your inner glory.
It is why some people call me the other black girl's name,
I shake my head and correct them nicely but they do not learn that way...a shame...
Shame on them, or shame on me?
They do not understand, yet I use the same strategy?
Perhaps it is on me to change the way,
I treat those that do not treat me the same?
'Black and British' should not be a thing,
It should be you, me, him, her, them and they,
But people look to your colour and country for your story,
And assume they realise your inner glory.

‘Black and British’? A poem by Dayna Francis

I am learning we are all the same when we are ill,
Yet they do not treat us with the same pill?
Doctors say it is because they have not seen enough representation,
In their reading of literature beyond one’s imagination,
The health of a black life is still incomprehensible?
The physical and mental implications of this are immeasurable...
What can one do to change the tone?
I am fed up of us suffering in silence, alone,
In our lonely plight for equality,
After centuries of ancestors lost in the name of finding peace...
‘Black and British’ should not be a thing,
It should be you, me, him, her, them and they,
But people look to your colour and country for your story,
And assume they realise your inner glory.

‘Black and British’? A poem by Dayna Francis

Because the different views we put on others
Can actually form these races and cultures,
And as beautiful as embracing all of that can be,
It takes us away from you being you and me being me.
We found beauty in division- how do we fix that?
It is a challenge, there is no hiding from that fact,
All I know is it will take the minds of those in charge,
To allow our rigid systems to open their arms.

Black History Month 2026: Honouring Our Communities

This year's Black History Month theme, “Honouring Our Communities,” is about more than places or postcodes. It is about people — Black people whose contributions make a difference every day, often without recognition.

Black History Month has rightly celebrated individuals whose achievements have changed history. But history is not only made by famous people or through major events. It is also built through everyday acts of care, leadership, courage and responsibility.

Across Britain, Black people are making a difference every day.

Nurses and carers provide compassion and dignity.

Volunteers give their time to support others. Community leaders bring people together and students contribute by celebrating, learning and sharing Black history.

These contributions may not always appear in history books, but they are felt in our communities. They create spaces where people feel supported, represented and that they belong.

Community has always been an important part of Black British history — from the early Black presence in Britain, through the Windrush generation, and continuing today. It has helped people build resilience, support one another and create positive change.

“Honouring Our Communities” asks us to make those contributions visible. It encourages us to think about whose stories we celebrate, whose work we value, and whose contributions may have been overlooked.

There is no single story of Black Britain. There are many communities, experiences and journeys — and this Black History Month, we celebrate them all.

Daphne Steele – A Black History Month Story

Daphne Steele made history as the first Black matron in the NHS when she became matron of St Winifred's Maternity Hospital in Ilkley in 1964. Originally from the Caribbean, she trained as a midwife in 1954 and went on to work in America, Oxfordshire and Manchester before taking up the role in Ilkley.

During her career, Daphne helped deliver hundreds of babies each year and made a significant contribution to nursing, midwifery and healthcare. After St Winifred's closed, she retrained as a health visitor and continued working in the local community.

Daphne Steele has been described as a “quiet revolutionary” who helped pave the way for other Black nurses and midwives in the NHS. Her achievements were recognised with an official blue plaque at the former St Winifred's, the first official Historic England blue plaque outside London. Her story is an important part of Yorkshire's history and the legacy of the Windrush generation.
